

I'm am ashamed and appalled that our nation's leaders would even consider catering to the whims of the financial bulldogs that demand a complete reversal of the principal that makes this federation wonderful and functional. The right of a state to act on it's own behalf, to protect it's own citizens. Perhaps the FCC could work on behalf of the citizens and not the minority money-holders, and consider the Tenth Amendment when debating the Wisconsin No-Call list. If the FCC should rule in favor of the bankers in this case, the precedent set for federal intervention into state affairs would magnify tenfold. The financial sector might argue that there is no harm in a phone call, but in an age when we try to teach our children to spend quality time with their families, and when Americans now more than ever need a reprieve from the busy world around them, phone calls during dinner and 15 messages on an answering machine after work do not help the cause. Please consider the needs of the people before considering the needs of a banker's pocketbook.
